R & B GEMS II

At the dawn of the rock 'n' roll era, it was common for rhythm and blues and even blues artists to occupy the pop charts right alongside Elvis, Jerry Lee and the Everlys. In fact, the whole field was so wide-open it begged the very question of what rock 'n' roll and rhythm and blues were (the answer had as much to do with who listened to the music as with who performed it). Chuck Berry and Bo Diddley launched their careers with blues because that's where the opportunities for black men were before rock 'n' roll came along. They later enjoyed success on both the pop and R & B charts, but in retrospect they were clearly rockers more than anything else.

Diddley in particular went under-rewarded as a rock 'n' roller in his heyday; only one of his epochal singles, music that influenced virtually every blues-based rocker of the '60s, even made the Top 40. Bo was too raw, strictly rhythm and blues. Much of it was his patented "shave and a haircut two bits" beat, which he'd taken from the sanctified churches of his native Mississippi.

But Bo was also into Afro-Americanism to an extent even the most open-minded white fans were not quite ready for yet. His stage name (his real name was Ellas McDaniel), which he got hanging out on Chicago's South Side as a kid, was also the name of a one-stringed African guitar. And songs like Mona were evocative of voodoo incantation.

Berry was true to his roots but also managed to chart pop frequently. Many listeners took Brown Eyed Handsome Man (which was not one of his pop hits) as a coded reference to Chuck himself. In his 1987 autobiography, he described being moved to write the first verse after watching an Anglo cop hassle a Chicano fan during his first California tour. After that, Berry's imagination seems to have taken over; the lines about Venus de Milo were obliquely inspired by his reading of the S & M classic Venus in Furs.

Although most bluesmen had to be content with recognition from the R & B audience only, several did experience brushes with the pop charts. Young Bobby "Blue" Bland came from the country outside Memphis in the late 1940s and put in time as B. B. King's valet. He sang with the Beale Streeters (an impromptu group that included King, Johnny Ace and Rosco Gordon), recorded for a few indie labels in the early '50s, and toured with Junior Parker's band. His own records started taking off around 1957, but he didn't leave Parker until 1961, when I Pity the Fool made him a full-fledged star. Shaped by Joe Scott, A & R man at Houston-based Duke Records, Bland's exciting, sophisticated-but-rough sound made him a ladies' favorite with crossover success. I Pity the Fool, one of many songs credited to Duke boss Don Robey (under his pen name Deadric Malone) but claimed by minor Duke artist Joe Medwick, was Bland's set opener through most of the 1960s.

Jerry Butler

Little Junior Parker was one of the funkiest bluesmen of the '50s, and his Mystery Train was one of the songs that helped catapult Elvis into the spotlight. Driving Wheel, a blues standard written and first performed by Chicago pianist Roosevelt Sykes, was more or less Junior's theme song.

Otis Rush, who moved to Chicago from Mississippi as a teen and became a full-time bluesman in 1955 at the age of 21, is one of the music's hard-luck stories. A volatile guitarist known for his unorthodox use of minor chords, Rush cut the doom-laden I Can't Quit You Baby for Cobra (then the No. 2 Chicago blues label after Chess). Writer-producer Willie Dixon took a dub to Big Bill Hill of WOPA, who deejayed out of a cleaner's window on the South Side, and Hill helped it become a top-10 R & B hit. Despite this promising start, Rush recorded only a handful of sides in the next decade-plus. Discouraged by a series of bad record deals, he was virtually retired by the late '60s. But in the mid-'70s he reestablished himself as a key figure on the international blues circuit.

Jimmy Reed, a Gary, Indiana, steelworker when he began cutting R & B hits in 1955, had no such problems. He recorded frequently right up until his death in 1976. His primitive, relaxed harp-and-guitar boogies made him one of the most imitated bluesmen. Bright Lights Big City was written, like most of his songs, with the help of his wife, "Mama," who came to sessions to whisper lyrics in his ear as he sang.

Ike Turner was a bridge between blues and rhythm and blues. A talent scout for various labels while living in Mississippi, he was responsible for definitive sides by B. B. King, Howlin' Wolf and many others. His own band, the Kings of Rhythm, cut Rocket 88, often cited as the first genuine rock 'n' roll song, in 1951; it came out under the name of Jackie Brenston, who sang lead.

In 1956 Turner moved the band to St. Louis, where a brash young woman named Annie Mae Bullock wheedled her way onto his stage for a song. Ike liked what he saw and heard so much that he incorporated her into the show as "Tina" and then in 1958 married her. They first re-recorded as Ike and Tina Turner in 1960, when she filled in for a singer who missed the session. I Idolize You is one of several hits they cut for the Sue label that attracted white listeners despite strong blues roots. Etta James was the other gutsy female shouter of this period who managed Top 40 appeal, thanks to material like All I Could Do Was Cry (co-written by Motown's Berry Gordy Jr.).

Most of the rest of these artists had little blues—but plenty of soul—in their music. With records like Cry to Me, Solomon Burke helped found the soul movement. Eddie Cooley is known primarily for co-writing Little Willie John's Fever, one of the landmark R & B hits of the era. Priscilla is one of only three singles he cut under his own name, and the only one to chart; it reveals rockabilly leanings unusual in northeastern urban black music.

The Chantels, led by the amazing Arlene Smith, were the trailblazers for the classic girl groups of the 1960s. Smith claimed she was taught singing by a nun at her Catholic school, where she was exposed to Gregorian chants and Latin hymns. The Bronx quintet was discovered singing backstage at a Frankie Lymon and the Teenagers concert by Richard Barrett of the Valentines, who wrote and produced Every Night.

Doggin' Around was a rare blues for Jackie Wilson, who began his career as Clyde McPhatter's replacement in Billy Ward and the Dominoes. Wilson went solo in 1957, and was known for his wailing, uninhibited shows. Doggin' Around and its flip side, Night, made up a two-sided hit, Wilson's biggest single ever. Ben E. King had been lead singer of the Drifters during their strings-and-ballads phase, and I (Who Have Nothing) was typical of his pop direction as a solo artist.

Idol with the Golden Head was one of the most clever, and lowest-charting, of the many novelty sides written and produced for the Coasters by Jerry Leiber and Mike Stoller.

Bobby Freeman was one of the few '50s rockers to emerge from San Francisco, and Betty Lou Got a New Pair of Shoes was the follow-up to his smash debut, Do You Wanna Dance.

Jerry Butler founded the Impressions (with Curtis Mayfield) in Chicago in 1957, but quickly went solo, enjoying his greatest success with ballads like Make It Easy on Yourself. The Detroit Spinners were formed by Harvey Fuqua after he left his original group, the Moonglows. He intended to keep the old name for the new group and record them for his new label, Tri-Phi. But after cutting That's What Girls Are Made For, he decided to change the name to the Spinners. This was the first single for both label and group.

Something of a cult figure among East Coast ballad aficionados, Chuck Jackson is not remembered in pop histories nearly as well as the two men who gave him I Wake Up Crying and several other hits. Hal David and Burt Bacharach's subsequent work with Dionne Warwick made them undisputed masters of the pop-soul sound later in the '60s. But that's another crossover story.
